Publications ranging from Bloomberg to Law360, Texas Lawyer, The Boston Globe, The Houston Chronicle and Texas Lawbook have spotlighted Haynes Boone, for its efforts to ensure parents and children seeking asylum at the South Texas border receive their due process.

Many publications featured Haynes Boone's successful efforts to persuade a federal judge to enjoin the removal of a 29-year-old Honduran woman and her 12-year-old daughter — a precedent-setting case.

"This is the first time a judge exercised jurisdiction over an expedited immigration proceeding to ensure due process," Partner Emily Westridge Black said in a Texas Lawyer article, adding that immigration cases do not usually deviate into federal district courts.

Media outlets have also profiled Haynes Boone's overall work on behalf of parents and children at the border.

"Our managing partner, Tim Powers, sent out a 'call to arms,' and the response from the firm's lawyers has been overwhelming," Debbie McComas, a partner and co-chair who represents corporations in cross-border disputes, told Texas Lawbook. "Lawyers in just about every office in the firm have signed up. Even a lawyer in our London office wants to be involved."
