Andrew Van Osselaer is a litigator focusing on the resolution of complex commercial disputes and regulatory investigations arising from clients' commercial and industrial operations. Whether advising a client in the aftermath of an environmental disaster, defending a client against a design-defect claim, or helping a client recover against a recalcitrant insurer, Andrew tailors practical solutions that help clients overcome immediate obstacles and plan for future contingencies.

Andrew represents clients in industry sectors that rely heavily on technical expertise and engineering judgment. These include various forms of product manufacturing; chemical manufacturing; industrial waste management; and industrial, infrastructural, and commercial design and construction. Because these clients' disputes often are as complex and diverse as their operations, Andrew's success has been in no small part due to his practiced skill in communicating complex and scientific concepts and his commitment to mastering the art of litigation in whatever battleground clients find themselves—whether before a court, a regulatory agency, or an international arbitration tribunal.

Andrew graduated from the University of Texas School of Law with High Honors and served as the Managing Editor of the Texas Law Review. Prior to law school, Andrew worked on the technical side of Austin's live music industry, specializing in lighting design and sound engineering.
